Question

I would like to request the amount of money the PSNI had to spend to police the Holyland area of South Belfast during the St Patrick's Day celebrations held there on March 17.

Answer

As part of a co-ordinated multi-agency response involved in organising and delivering St Patrick's day celebrations across the city it cost £81,697.06 to police the Holyland area of South Belfast on 17th March 2011.

Police, statutory agencies, volunteers, universities and residents representatives adopted an early intervention approach which aimed to limit and tackle any significant public order. Police made 8 arrests and a number of individuals were reported for on street drinking and a large amount of alcohol was confiscated.

Police are committed to working year round to address anti-social behaviour and on street drinking and will work with local residents and their representatives to achieve this.
